Treatment & Prevention of Incontinence Associated Dermatitis In Aged Care

Incontinence Associated Dermatitis (IAD) is a significant but largely preventable problem (1, 2). IAD is inflammation of the skin because of urinary and/or faecal incontinence (3). The management and prevention of IAD consists of assessment and management of incontinence and adopting a structured skin care routine (1).

A structured skin care routine consists of cleansing the skin prior to application of a skin protectant, protecting the skin to avoid or minimise exposure to urine and/or faeces, and restoring the skin to support and maintain the barrier function of the skin using a suitable leave on product (4).

Avoid the use of soap for cleansing the skin and instead use products that are as close to neutral pH as possible (4.5-5.5). These products include foam cleansers, moistened body tissues, or emollients that cleanse and moisturise the skin at the same time. Pat the skin dry rather than rub.

After cleansing the skin, it is important to apply a barrier preparation to protect the skin. These products help to maintain the barrier function of the skin by providing an impermeable or semi-permeable barrier to protect it from urine and/or faeces.

MARCH IS NUTRITION MONTH!

March is Nutrition Month!

Nutrition is an important part of health and well-being for residents in aged care. Good nutrition can help prevent disease, improve cognitive function, and strengthen the immune system.

Key nutrients like calcium, iron, zinc, vitamins D and B12 must be consumed in adequate amounts to support the needs of aging bodies and prevent deficiencies and related health problems. Maintaining good nutrition is important for health, well-being, and quality of life during the later years.

Ear Irrigation

Propulse Ear Irrigator Purple Lid INCL 10 QRXTips

The ProPulse is a cost-effective, easy-to-use and easy-to-clean device for effective ear wax removal for General Practices. Earwax, or cerumen, is produced naturally and with some people, it can build up over time blocking the canal, which results in hearing loss and sometimes infection. An ear irrigator works by pumping water behind the ear wax so it can flush out all the debris making the ear canal clean.
